The antibiotic therapy of severe infections, by a better understanding of the infecting organism, the interaction with the host, and the diverse pathophysiologic mechanisms led to significant progress in the management of infections in pediatrics. The most recent antibiotics (teicoplanin, linezolid, daptomycin) are reviewed, through their empirical prescription and the interest of their recent clinical data. Their specific resistance profiles, their modes of action, their role in the choice of regimen, their clinical results, and their interactions with other drugs are described, as well as the main principles in the management of these infections in pediatrics.
