: The Grand Global Cultural Disconnect This article appeared in Boston Review (a political and culture magazine, in May 2017. The original post is here: The familiar portrait of monsters and heroes, good and evil, is a cultural construct, and we've become dangerously comfortable with imagining the world as black-and-white, as clearly defined, in spite of our imperfections, as the 1950's human-vs-beast movie. This ideology is intuitive, ubiquitous, and profoundly damaging. Believing that society is divided between the celestial and the terrestrial, angelic and demonic, has the capacity to distract us from the world that we inhabit by instilling the belief that it is absolutely different from our lived experience, separated by something fundamental and sacrosanct like clouds, space, oceans, history, politics, art, or culture. Recognizing this doesn't mean that you have to believe that there is an evil race of lizard man existing in some secure location, a prime directive which applies to every human society, and that we are informed we should all be and do better. Nor does it mean that there is a good race of angelic enlightened human being or an inherent difference that somehow trumps our experiences and traditions. Instead, it may be more useful to notice the ways in which we have contributed to a colossal and dismaying mistake. That mistake isn't only one of mass planetary consciousness, but of the psychological, cognitive, emotional, and intellectual condition of humans in the first place. If we couldn't identify the monstrous nature of certain humans as, say, Hitler or the Nazis, then we would get more comfortable with the idea that people are defined not just by the type and level of their evil, but by their nature, type, and level of good. That is, by the way they behave, and by our relationship with them, on the global level. We have encoded into our conception of the world the images that we see in the media — such as the white, paternalistic savior, the violent terrorist, the nameless, faceless, lone wolf piloting a airplane into a building — not just because media reproduces social perception (and isn't that a vicious circle?). But more importantly, we take these representations as self-consistent and transcending the norm we observed (or continue to observe) when we see them. Hist
