Evolution of viral, molecular, and virologic tools to study HIV-1 pathogenesis in humans. This review focuses on the technical and conceptual evolution of the tools available to study the human immunodeficiency virus type 1 (HIV-1). Many studies have used naturally occurring HIV-1 in different host populations to establish certain correlates of protection or susceptibility to HIV-1 infection, acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (AIDS), or its complications. These studies have included early observations on the molecular diversity of HIV-1 strains and their selective pressures in different hosts. Because these observations were obtained largely from the early epidemic period of the HIV-1 pandemic, their value for predicting the course of contemporary HIV-1 epidemics has been questioned. In contrast, a number of molecular and virologic tools have been developed specifically for the study of contemporary HIV-1 epidemics. For example, the development of reverse transcriptase (RT) and protease nucleotide substitution and divergence-constant (DS-C) algorithms and their application to the study of contemporary HIV-1 strains have enabled detailed characterization of the biology of HIV-1 replication in vivo. Furthermore, the development of two new assays for measuring replication competence in infected cells based on the use of a dual-luciferase reporter system and a novel dual-luciferase methodology to demonstrate the release of infectious HIV-1 have begun to elucidate the relationship between host factors and HIV-1 pathogenesis. These methods may provide a means to determine whether host cell genes or biological factors can be targeted in conjunction with antiretroviral drug therapy to decrease or prevent the emergence of drug-resistant viral strains in infected individuals.
