There are numerous instances in which a fluid stream or vapor needs to be maintained at a particular temperature or pressure. Such streams are often either heated, cooled, humidified or dehumidified through the use of a heat or cold exchanger and an appropriate heat transfer fluid. A heat exchanger contains a conductive or convective path to transfer heat from one fluid to another. The heat exchanger consists of a number of individual cells with fins and/or tubing which provide such a path. The fins and/or tubing provide for both thermally and flow continuity between adjacent cells and form a tortuous path which allows the fluid to be conveyed from one cell to another. However, a problem with these conventional heat exchangers is that the fluid pressure drop caused by the use of an excessive number of cells per unit of tubing or by extraneous elements, such as tubing, creates a pressure drop that interferes with the fluid flowing between the cells. In such cases the pressure drop is often determined by the fluid flow rate in the upstream cell and by the pressure drop which exists in the downstream cell. This problem is discussed in "Thermal Exchange Systems Operating at High Pressure Drop" by A.
